The Road Untravelled

A road, path or walkway can be a route to somewhere, a place on which to journey, have an adventure or find one's way. It provides a way to go from here to there. Is it a physical reality: a construction or clearing of the landscape existing over time and bearing the scars of millions of feet and man made objects that aid locomotion; such as wheels, tracks and skis?

Maybe it is none of these things but a process one follows throughout life or in the pursuit of long desired goals? Could the road also be the decisions one makes along the way: the tools or materials one chooses to work with? Does it feature people one meets along the way: those who become close friends and the fleeting encounters that, much like the rock that skips across the surface of a still pond, cause ripples and possible changes in the direction of the journey? Does it involve a glimpse of a beautiful scene or landscape, an animal or plant, a machine or invention or an inspiring book or movie?

How many potential roads have we not travelled over a lifetime? What if time travel is a reality and not just a state of existence in the minds of science fiction writers? How do we reverse or unravel our current existence back to the beginning and make different choices? What would this journey and new current reality be like?

So many questions to ponder: our deliberations and answers, expressed in our favourite medium of textiles are presented here for you to explore and enjoy. Join us on our journeys.
